On July 26, The Hamilton Project at the Brookings Institution and Democracy: A Journal of Ideas will host a discussion on the development of a social contract for all Americans.

In the decades after World War II, the United States developed an implicit social compact that businesses, government and individuals would all play a role in ensuring the health, retirement and other benefits that families need. That social contract is breaking down as firms retreat from their role as a provider of social benefits and as demographic trends strain our social insurance programs. In a global economy marked by rapid technological change, global labor markets, and mobile capital, a new model is needed to provide American families with economic security and to keep the American economy productive.

Following a welcome by Jason Furman, senior fellow at The Brookings Institution and director of The Hamilton Project, a roundtable of leading experts will discuss their views on what the obligations of government, employers and individuals should be to one another in such changed world.

Participants will include: Jared Bernstein, director of the Living Standards Program for the Economic Policy Institute (EPI); Jason Bordoff, policy director for The Hamilton Project; Stuart Butler, vice president of Domestic and Economic Policy Studies at the Heritage Foundation; Thea Lee, policy director for the AFL-CIO; and Mark Schmitt, senior fellow with The New America Foundation and columnist for The American Prospect. The panel will be moderated by Kenneth Baer, co-editor of Democracy: A Journal of Ideas.

Following the discussion, the panelists will take audience questions.

A light lunch will be served.
